Program Objectives

students and faculty consider issues involving gender and communication, multiculturalism, ethics, health communication, media and public policy, and other current topics. Understanding the process of communication is as important to our democracy as public speaking was for the ancient Greeks.

The bachelor of arts degree in communication provides comprehensive knowledge about the nature of communication, the symbol systems by which it functions, the environments in which it occurs, its media, and its effects. Employing critical and empirical approaches, the program spans the social sciences, humanities, and fine arts. The bachelor of arts in media studies focuses on understanding, creating, and exploiting various social and participatory media through a program of integrated courses in media writing, criticism, and production. Our goal is to graduate literate, capable, and responsible media professionals.
