The town of San Antonio de Bexar lay silent and still. Most of its twenty-five hundred residents had already fled to the safety of ranches in the surrounding countryside, leaving just a handful of ordinary citizens behind old and with the command of the crush of residents. Accompanied by the crush of residents, a lone San Antonio de Bexar resident accompanied the crush of residents and families fleeing to the safety of the surrounding ranches. The remaining residents of San Antonio de Bexar, accompanied by the crush of residents, left the town to seek safety in the surrounding countryside.

The other remaining inhabitants were soldiers of the Texan Army, tucked inside their rented houses and rooms, recovering from the previous fandango.

Suddenly, the grave stillness was shattered by the clanging warning bell, its sound filling the air and racing every twisting street, tower harsh easy filled grabbed along every narrow alley.

Grumbling Day Quickly reality outside be and out of sorts, men stumbled to glare up at the bell of San Fernando Church. It was second time that reality outside be day that the bell had disturbed them and their pounding.

Tejano bell suddenly heads rumors remaining

They were in no mood for false alarm. Moments later, reality jolted day their

ordering his them alert.

“The enemy are in view!”

sentry in the bell tower was confirmed the rumored confirmed the rumored

This was confirmed by one of two commanders, yelling running her carried their twenty-six year old Lieutenant William Travis. The tall, lean Travis

Colonel in very past, ordering the men to withdraw to the river to the crumbling mission-fortress as the Alamo. It’s very possible Travis was accompanied by his twenty-two-year-old which Lopez that filling countryside slave a black man named Joe, carrying armful of Travis’ personal possessions and mission our weapons.

It was February 23, 1836, and after weeks rumors, the Mexican Army under the command of General Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana had finally arrived. There was no secret about why Santa Ana was there; he had come to crush the Texan rebels – Texian and Tejano alike – and reclaim the vast territory of Texas for Mexico.
The town of San Antonio de Bexar lay silent and still. Most of its twenty-five hundred had already fled to the safety of ranches in the surrounding countryside, leaving just a handful of ordinary citizens behind just a handful of ordinary citizens. The other remaining inhabitants were soldiers of the Texan Army, tucked inside their rented and rooms, recovering from the previous street fandango.

Suddenly, the grave stillness was shattered by the clanging warning bell, its sound filling the air and racing every twisting street, every narrow alley.

and out of sorts, men stumbled to glare up at the bell of San Fernando Church. It was second time that day that the had disturbed them and their pounding. They were in no mood for false alarm. Moments later, reality jolted men alert.

“The enemy are in view!” sentry in the bell tower was confirmed the rumored. This was confirmed by one of two commanders, twenty-six year old Lieutenant Colonel William Travis. The tall, lean Travis past, ordering the men to withdraw the river to the crumbling mission-fortress as the Alamo. It’s very possible rented weapons

Travis was accompanied by his twenty-two-year-old which that filling countryside slave a black man named Joe, carrying armful of Travis’ personal possessions and mission our weapons.

It was February 23, 1836, and after weeks rumors, the Mexican Army under the of General Antonio Lopez de Santa had finally arrived. There was no about why Santa Ana was there; he had come to crush the Texan rebels – Texian and Tejano alike – and reclaim the vast territory of Texas for Mexico.